greater dispatch. Hon. Mr. Wilder, had he spoken before the last speaker, would have said just what that gentleman did. He concurred in all that had fallen from him. In the Session of 1868, he (Mr. Wilder) had introdued a Resolution for a division of the Houses, but he had since changed his mind.

was not brought upby this Administration, and therefore the Cabinet are free to give their separate views upon it. When I came here, not quite six years ago, I saw a new sight, in Ministers, Nobles and Representatives sitting in one Legislative Assembly. knew what that meant in other countries, but in the office that I held, it was not for me to express my views; until now, my mouth has been shut upon that subject. I know, that we ought not to apply to Hawaii the views which are held in foreign countries, unless circumstances are similar. But my experience is, that there is human nature in all men. In looking in men's eyes, I can always see in them that which is common to all men. Therefore I think we must hesitate long before we discard from Hawaii the principles of political wisdom in which the best minds abroad have placed their faith. These amendments were promised by Lunalilo, and many of the people expect them to be adopted. No Representative should return to his constituents without showing that he has well considered both sides of this question. The old Constitution of 1852 provided for two Houses, according to the English and American systems, and I with two Houses than one, the time is well spent. The reasons in favor of the division are these, viz. I. The legislationwill be more deliberate, with less danger of hasty and rash action. The responsibility will be divided, and a crowd cannot bring a pressure to bear on two Houses for passing a measure, which they might bring upon one House. I have seen here and elsewhere, that it is easy to carry a measure hastily through one House, which is afterwards regretted when too late, and when such action would not be taken by two Houses. II. A lower House has power by itself, which it has not when sitting with the upper House. With twenty

Nobles and four Ministers, the twenty-eight Repre is weakness in all of us. For myself I don't wish rewards for their votes. I don't wish to see how Representatives vote, if I can be assured that they try t vote wisely, for the interests of the country, and not for their own pockets. In years back, I have seen Representatives watching, afraid to cast their votes, until they see how those in power, from whom they expect favors, are going to vote. III. A lower House will have nower in holding the dangerous curse if not accompanied by intelligence and honesty. If we have a lower House, we must depend on the people to send their wisest and best men as Representatives. And also, we must do as in England, when great measures brought forward by explain and advocate their measures, and if they cannot get the confidence of the country, must give place In voting as I shall for this amendment, I know there is reason to doubt the result. It all depends on whether the intelligence of the people and their honesty can be relied upon. If this amendment be adopted. I warn you, Mr. Chairman, that the safety of Hawaii will depend more than ever before, upon the increase of intelligence among the people. I shall vote for the amendment, not without hesitation, but because I know that this nation will grow better or

Mr. Kaukaha spoke with energy of the advantages of one House, where the Representatives had the opportunity of speaking face to face with Ministers and Nobles ; it was much better than when in separate Houses they had no opportunity to have wanted this separation of the Houses; there had been no petitions to that effect. Hon. Mr. Bishop said that the question was, what was the disadvantage of remaining as we are, one House, and what would be the advantage of two? It is plain that the expense with two Houses would be considerably increased, and the time occupied in the session would be increased. But notwithstanding these objections, if he could be convinced that there would be any corresponding advantages gaine, he would favor a division. He had originally been opposed to having one house, but the experience of numerous sessions had caused him to alter his mind ters he had brought forward these amendments. That was done principally because the King's honor was involved. His late Majesty had promised, before his election, to regore the features of the Constitution of 1852, and that was something he had not the power to do. Buthe did what he could do in honor, to keep his pledge, by placing the amendments before the Legislature. He (Mr. Bishop) as the King's
